

FACING ADDICTION WITH HOPE AND UNDERSTANDING

Breaking the Silence: Child Sexual Abuse, Cultural Stigma, and the Path to Healing in Black Families Facing Addiction

FAHU Research Desk

May 2026

facingaddictionwithhope.com

All content grounded in peer-reviewed research and clinical evidence.

Breaking the Silence: Child Sexual Abuse, Cultural Stigma, and the Path to Healing in Black Families Facing Addiction

INTRODUCTION: THE WEIGHT OF SILENCE

There is a particular kind of silence that falls over families when something unspeakable has happened. It is not the silence of peace. It is the silence of survival — the kind that accumulates over generations, compressing trauma into the bones of children who grow up carrying secrets they were never meant to carry alone. For many Black families navigating the devastating intersection of child sexual abuse (CSA) and substance use, this silence is not a choice. It is, as researcher Banks-Chatman (2026) carefully documents, the product of deeply interwoven forces: cultural stigma, historical trauma, and systemic mistrust that has been earned through generations of institutional betrayal.

Understanding this silence — and learning how to gently, compassionately break it — may be one of the most important things families can do in service of healing. For organizations like FAHU, which stands on the premise that facing addiction with hope and understanding is the only morally defensible path forward, the research of Banks-Chatman offers a profound and necessary foundation: you cannot address what you cannot name, and you cannot name what you have been taught, by experience and by culture, is dangerous to speak aloud.

ANALYSIS: WHAT THE RESEARCH REVEALS ABOUT SILENCE AND TRAUMA

Banks-Chatman's 2026 theoretical manuscript, "Shattered Chains: Shedding Light on Child Sexual Abuse in the Black Community,"

synthesizes interdisciplinary scholarship through three interconnected frameworks — Critical Race Theory, Attachment Theory, and Trauma-Informed Care — to examine why CSA disclosure among Black children is so frequently delayed, suppressed, or never made at all. The implications for addiction recovery within Black families are profound, because the research community has long understood that unprocessed childhood trauma is one of the most significant predictors of later substance use disorders.

What Banks-Chatman illuminates is that for Black children, disclosure of sexual abuse is not simply a matter of trust or bravery. It is shaped by structural forces. Critical Race Theory, as applied in this framework, asks us to see how systemic racism shapes the very conditions under which a child might speak — or remain silent. When communities have legitimate historical reasons to distrust law enforcement, child welfare systems, and medical institutions, the act of disclosure becomes freighted with consequences that extend far beyond the individual child. To speak may mean inviting the police into one's home. It may mean watching a family member — perhaps the only breadwinner — be taken away by a system that has never demonstrated it cares about Black families' long-term welfare. The silence, in this context, is not pathological. It is adaptive. And yet, as Banks-Chatman (2026) underscores, these "barriers contribute to delayed intervention, untreated trauma, and long-term psychological, emotional, and relational harms."

This is where Attachment Theory enters the picture with particular power. Children are wired to seek safety from caregivers. When abuse originates within or close to the family system, or when the family system itself is fragmented by poverty, incarceration, or prior trauma, the child's attachment architecture is disrupted. They may love the people who have failed to protect them. They may fear the consequences of disclosure more than they fear the abuse itself. Attachment Theory helps us understand that healing is not simply about removing a child from danger — it is about rebuilding the relational scaffolding that makes trust possible again.

Trauma-Informed Care, the third framework in Banks-Chatman's synthesis, provides the clinical and ethical bridge between understanding and action. It asks practitioners, family members, and community supporters to approach survivors not with the question "What is wrong with you?" but rather "What happened to you?" This reframing is not merely semantic. It is the difference between a child — and later, an adult — feeling judged or feeling witnessed.

SYNTHESIS: THE ADDICTION CONNECTION

Why does any of this matter to families facing addiction? Because the pathway from unprocessed childhood sexual trauma to substance use disorder is both well-documented in the broader addiction science literature and deeply relevant to understanding why Black individuals may face particular barriers to both disclosure and recovery. When a child cannot speak about what happened, the trauma does not disappear. It goes underground. It emerges, years later, in anxiety, depression, relational instability, and — very frequently — in self-medication through alcohol, opioids, cannabis, or other substances.

For families watching a loved one struggle with addiction, understanding this upstream trauma is not about excusing behavior. It is about accurately diagnosing the problem. You cannot help someone recover from addiction if you are treating only the symptom while the wound beneath it remains untouched. And you cannot address that wound if the culture of silence Banks-Chatman describes remains firmly in place.

This is where the question of community access becomes critically important. Banks-Chatman's framework points toward the need for culturally grounded, community-embedded support systems — spaces where Black families can receive information, validation, and resources without navigating institutions that have historically harmed them. This connects meaningfully to the broader public health research on where and how communities actually receive health information.

A 2026 cross-sectional study published in JMIR Public Health and Surveillance examined the determinants of willingness to receive health information from neighborhood food and beauty establishments — barbershops, salons, grocery stores, and similar community-embedded spaces. The study found that while healthcare providers remain the most trusted sources of health information in the abstract, community service establishments represent "important, yet underused, sources of health information" that can facilitate "broader engagement with the general population" (JMIR Public Health and Surveillance 2026). For Black communities specifically, where barbershops and beauty salons have long served as informal community hubs, this research suggests a powerful model: bringing trauma-informed, addiction-recovery-aware health messaging into the spaces where people already gather, already trust, and already feel safe.

This is the kind of community health architecture that Banks-Chatman's framework implicitly calls for. Trauma-Informed Care is not only a clinical model — it is a community model. It asks: how do we build the conditions under which people feel safe enough to speak, to seek help, and to heal? For Black families navigating the aftermath of childhood sexual abuse and its downstream effects on substance use, the answer cannot be "come to a clinic." It must be: "We are coming to you. We are in your neighborhood. We are in the spaces you trust."

THE FAMILY AS BOTH WOUND AND MEDICINE

One of the most striking — and most hopeful — dimensions of Banks-Chatman's work is its insistence on holding the family system in both its complexity and its potential. Black families navigating CSA are not simply sites of failure. They are sites of extraordinary resilience, operating under conditions of structural oppression that most researchers and clinicians have been slow to fully reckon with. The same cultural values that can contribute to silence — loyalty, privacy, protection of the family's reputation in a world that already judges Black families harshly — are also sources of profound strength when channeled toward healing.

Attachment Theory, as Banks-Chatman (2026) applies it, reminds us that relational healing requires relational repair. The goal is not to sever the family from the child or the adult survivor. The goal is to help the family system become a safer, more honest, more boundaried place — one where the silence can finally begin to lift. For families navigating addiction alongside CSA history, this means recognizing that recovery is rarely an individual journey. It is a family journey, with all the complexity, love, conflict, and possibility that entails.

CONCLUSION: FACING IT TOGETHER

Banks-Chatman writes of "shattered chains" — a metaphor that carries both the weight of bondage and the promise of freedom. The chains of silence, stigma, and systemic mistrust that surround child sexual abuse in Black communities are real. They have real consequences: delayed intervention, untreated trauma, and, downstream, substance use disorders that tear through families already stretched thin by structural inequality.

But chains can be shattered. The research points toward how: through frameworks that honor both the structural and the relational dimensions of trauma, through community-embedded outreach that meets people where they are, and through a cultural shift — within families, communities, and institutions — from judgment toward understanding.

For FAHU, this research is both a call to humility and a call to action. Humility, because the path to healing in Black families navigating CSA and addiction is not simple, and no outside organization should pretend otherwise. And action, because the evidence is clear: silence costs lives, and hope — grounded in real understanding of real conditions — is not naive. It is necessary.

Facing addiction with hope and understanding means, at its most fundamental level, being willing to look honestly at where addiction comes from. For many survivors, it comes from pain that was never allowed a voice. Giving that pain a voice — safely, compassionately, with cultural humility and systemic awareness — is not just good science. It is a moral imperative.

Works Cited

Banks-Chatman. "Shattered Chains: Shedding Light on Child Sexual Abuse in the Black Community." Journal of Child Sexual Abuse, 2026. <https://pubmed.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/42126391/>.

Anonymous. "Determinants of Willingness to Receive Health Information From Neighborhood Food and Beauty Establishments: Cross-Sectional Study." JMIR Public Health and Surveillance, 2026. <https://pubmed.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/42133973/>.

Facing Addiction with Hope and Understanding — facingaddictionwithhope.com

All sources verified at time of publication.